brass vsti descargar gratisQ: SpringBoot JPA @OneToMany Question Suppose I have a simple parent - child relationship, and my parent entity has a collection of children,
"foo".
public class Parent { @Id public String
 id; @OneToMany(mappedBy = "parent",
 cascade = CascadeType.ALL, fetch = FetchType.EAGER)
 @JsonIgnore public Set

children; } In my response, I have a simple child. What I don't get is why my Child is not part of the response. @JsonInclude(JsonInclude.Include.NON_NULL) public class Child { @Id public String id; public Parent parent; }

It appears the parent is in the response, but I don't understand why the child isn't. Is there a specific reason why the child object is not included? A: As much as I agree with @BoraCunar, I've got to disagree with your conclusion. Your Question is specifically about the Spring Boot data response, not your domain model. Spring Boot data is responsible for mapping between objects (entities) in the domain model and the response. Why do I have to specify @JsonIgnore for the parent property in the Child entity? The @JsonIgnore annotation is required to prevent the Spring Boot data mapper (also known as the repository) from retrieving the child instance (object) from the parent instance when you update the parent instance. What if I have a single row in the database (because I'm only querying by a primary key)? I want to return all of the data from the database, not just the parent.

In this case I would suggest retrieving a parent object along with its associated child objects. This is not possible with the default parent-child mapping without overriding the retrieval methods. This is why the mappings should specify either a fetch expression in the mapping (use `FetchType.EAGER`) or use the `findAll` methods of the repository. In my response, I have a simple child. What I don't get is why my `Child` is not part of the response.
